Santorum used to be a Christian candidate. If he were going to win the election, what would he do differently? Santorum used to be a Christian candidate. If he were going to win the election, what would he do differently? By Kurt Helling, August 28, 2012 In 2012, the church is in a moment of crisis. Churches are closing and young people are leaving the faith. If the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life is correct, three-quarters of Americans claim no religious affiliation. In the 1972 Presidential election, as a Christian, Senator Robert J. Dole (R-Kan.) ran for the Republican presidential nomination. His sole campaign platform was stated in his March 12, 1972 speech at a conference of young Republicans. During the debate which ensued, a person whose opinions I highly respect and admire asked me: "Senator Dole, if you ran for President this year what would be your main difference from your 1972 campaign?" His response was: "I would now emphasize my family experience. In 1972 my family and I moved from Wisconsin to Kansas." Therefore, if a Christian wants to win the White House, the candidate should emphasize his family experience. Bill Clinton once said, "The arc of the moral universe is long but it bends towards justice." On the other hand, President Obama has said there is no such thing as a Christian nation and has said that America is a nation "of Muslims and Christians." Does President Obama really believe that there is such a thing as a Christian nation? If not, why not? Moreover, why do only Christian nations exist? It's been observed that there is a distinction between religion and the state. My question is whether there is a distinction between Christianity and the Christian nation. The Founding Fathers believed in America's Christian heritage. They saw the separation of church and state as consistent with the separation of church and state in the First Amendment of the Constitution. [On June 14, 1779] Thomas Jefferson wrote, "On the religious side of the Constitution, I see nothing but what is called, a wall of separation between church and state." He added, "It is impossible to draw a line between church and state... in this country." My question is, is there a distinction between Christianity and the Christian nation? If There's a difference between getting data to yourself and sharing it with other people. Our digital world is all about the former. The way the Internet is created is to serve the needs of few and conceal everything that's true for the rest of humanity. We should question the purposes of an app, a platform, and a mechanism. Does it have a good reason to be, that we can't explain? The Fakeproof project by John Woodrow Cox aims to do exactly that. By looking into the source of social data and trying to piece it back together, users can observe how a platform works, and try to get the real information that's hidden behind the facade. It's an interesting idea, and how you'd approach the project depends on your relationship with anonymity, as you'll either have to sacrifice it or get into trouble if you're not very careful. If you're a person whose only reason for using the Internet is to surf and share links, there's one good argument to make, but if you want to bring transparency to the Web, the truth is that the most important data is the stuff we don't want to make public. Despite the fact that we have to, try to be real for one another. The individuals behind the pages you're looking at, the photos you like, and the ads you click on are individuals, not logos, ideas, or fictional characters. It's time to use the Internet and the Web to find out about ourselves, our activities, and our surroundings.A letter from New Orleans Saints coach Sean Payton to Minnesota Vikings quarterback Kirk Cousins Throughout the offseason there have been numerous reports of the Minnesota Vikings' quarterback Kirk Cousins and wide receiver Stefon Diggs being considered for trade or a holdout, but any stories or rumors that the two have been at odds have been false.
